HOURS, SPEED & NO-PICKUPS

Follow-up

Your hours & the 60-second rule

Standby: 9am to 6pm Monday to Friday, plus Saturday mornings till lunch. Saturday afternoons aren't worth calling — nobody picks up.

Leads land scattered through the day, and here's the thing that makes this whole role work: the moment someone enquires, they are literally on their phone. It's the one moment of the entire day you're guaranteed to reach them. Sixty seconds later they've put it down, opened something else, and your odds drop with every minute.

So between 9 and 6, the rule is firm: call within 60 seconds of the notification — or as close to it as humanly possible. If you're in the middle of something, it can wait sixty seconds; the lead can't. This isn't a nice-to-have, it's the job. The faster you call, the more you book, the more you earn. Simple.

After 6pm, Monday to Friday — your choice, and it's smart money. A lead that enquires at 7:30pm is just as warm as a 2pm one, and nobody else is calling them. You're never required to pick up the phone after 6 — but every evening lead you choose to call is a conversion the morning would have lost.

Any lead that lands outside your hours and doesn't get an evening call: 9am sharp, first thing, before anything else.

If they don't pick up — the 3-day chase

Day 1 — minimum 3 calls. Call within 60 seconds. No answer? Call again immediately — people miss the first ring constantly and answer the second. Still nothing: send Text 1 (below) and get on with your day. Then hit them again mid-afternoon, and once more towards the end of the day. Three separate moments minimum — someone busy at 11 is free at 5. No voicemail on day 1; keep them curious enough to answer.

Day 2 — two calls, voicemail and text. One morning, one afternoon. On the first, leave the voicemail (below) and send Text 2 right after it — the voicemail and the text land together, so your name's in two places on their phone.

Day 3 — last call, then park it. One final call at a time you haven't tried yet. No answer: send the final text and put the lead away. If they reply next week or next month, pick it up like no time has passed — they enquired once, they're still a homeowner with the same water.

That's eight touches in three days. It feels like a lot from your side; from theirs it reads as a company that actually wants their business. The leads you lose from chasing hard are leads that were never booking — the ones you win are pure profit.

Cancellations — always a phone call, never a text back

If a booked customer cancels or tries to, you call them the moment you see it. Never accept a cancellation by text — a text costs them nothing; a conversation makes them think again.

> "Hey [Name], saw your message — wanted to catch you quickly because our technician's already going to be out your way that day. What's happened on your end?"

If it's a time problem: move the time, never the commitment —

> "No stress at all — would earlier or later that day work better, or the day after? He's out that way anyway, so we've got a bit of room to move."

If it's cold feet: lower the stakes and hold the booking —

> "Completely fair. Just remember there's nothing to decide on the day — it's a free test, you'll see exactly what's in your water, and worst case you've lost an hour and learnt something about your home. Let's keep your spot, and if the timing's genuinely wrong, we'll move it."

The goal of every cancellation call: walk away with a new time, or the old time kept. A reschedule is a save; a cancel is only ever the last resort.

Text 1 — straight after the first missed call

> Hi [Name], it's [Your Name] from Neptune Filtration — just tried to give you a quick call about your water enquiry. I'll try you again shortly, or reply here with a time that suits and I'll call you then. Thanks, Neptune Filtration!

Voicemail — day 2, first morning attempt

> "Hey [Name], it's [Your Name] from Neptune Filtration, following up on your water enquiry. I'll give you another try later today — or call us back on this number whenever suits. Talk soon."

Short, warm, no detail — the goal is a callback, not a pitch on tape.

Text 2 — day 2, with the voicemail

> Hi [Name], [Your Name] from Neptune Filtration here — tried to reach you a couple of times about your water enquiry. Reply with a good time and I'll call you then. Thanks, Neptune Filtration!

Final text — day 3, after the last call

> Hi [Name], we haven't been able to catch you about your water enquiry, so I'll leave it with you — reply here anytime and we'll pick it up from there. Thanks, Neptune Filtration!

When they finally pick up

> "Hey [Name] — it's [Your Name] from Neptune Filtration, tried you a little earlier. How are you going?"

Then straight into the normal script from the top — same call, same flow. Never open with an apology or "sorry to chase you"; they enquired, you're simply getting back to them.
